Every Saturday afternoon he walked to Washington for the purpose of taking 'drawings, and procuring the exact proportions of the buildings, returning to his labor on Monday. Nights through the week were devoted to the construction of his ideal model -and through many months he toiled, walking to Washington and back each week. At skill, rare, beautiful and praiseworthy. For a moderate promissory compensation, he agreed to place it in the Museum. Circumstances beyond his control prevented his ever receiving a cent from the Museum, and in the lapse of years his model was sold with the establishment. Thus the ideal of his toilsome days and nights, passed forever from him. For years and years afterward, the poor carpenter came daily to look upon the beautiful outgrayth of his cenius. that, with the introduction of railroads, the trade of brigandism on the high road would be at an end. It appears not to be the case, however, in the Papal States. From the official paper of Rome, of the 13th November last, we learn that the railroad train between Francati and Rome was stopped by a party of bigands, who, at night, imitating the signal for the stoppage of the train, brought it to a halt. They immediately secured the engineer and firemen, and then after detaching the locomotive from the cars, proceeded with perfect impunity to rifle the pockets and baggage of the passengers. A brigand was stationed at either season, except the passengers. A brigand was stationed at either showing the passengers to deliver up their valuables. As the people of the Roman States are not allowed to carry arms, they are at the mercy of the brigands, who gave a the treath of the technique of the techniq
